McNay Art Museum presents stellar German exhibit

Christina Acosta | 15 de Febrero de 2016

Art is an expression that tell a story about a time dear to the artist's heart— At the McNay, there is a new exhibit that dedicates the full story of a powerful country.

This week, the museum presented 84 paintings of the most significant European art created by both masters and emerging artists in "Made in Germany: Contemporary Art from the Rubell Family Collection." In fact, the McNay is the only venue that has scheduled to host the seminal exhibition, which is the first presentation of the Rubell Family Collection's acclaimed German holdings.

For the past 35 years, German art has gone through a futile period, during which large-scale works, particularly large-scale photographs, have become contemporary and widespread. The exhibit covers many German paintings, sculptures, photographs and works on paper.

Visitors will be able to admire the established works of famous artists like Anselm Kiefer, Sigmar Polke, and Gerhard Richter; sculptors Katarina Fritsch and Thomas Schutte; photographers Bernd and Hilla Becher, Thomas Demand and Thomas Ruff; and fresh coming painters Kerstin Bratsch and David Ostrowski.

"At the McNay, we have a preeminent concentration of modern European art, but this presentation is our first exhibition of important art from the last few decades. It is also worth noting that in the late 1800s, Germans made up approximately one-third of the population here in Bexar County,” discussed Chief Curator/Curator of Contemporary Art René Paul Barilleaux. “In those respects, ‘Made in Germany’ is directly linked both to one of the McNay’s foremost focuses and to the history of our wider San Antonio community.”

Barilleaux organized the exhibition to reflect the perspective of the Rubell Family Collection. It is one of the world’s largest privately owned contemporary art collections established in 1964.

The Rubell Family has been the key collectors of German art, and there has been no presentation of it until the McNay decided to put it on display. Barilleaux took his time to not only filter the works solely through an encyclopedic lens, but to offer immediate insights into how German Art has engaged collectors in recent years.

The near-chronological presentation results in a compelling narrative that reveals how individual artists first gained attention; the dynamic between students, teachers and peers; and the ongoing dialogue created as younger artists’ reflect from the giants who proceed them.

For Juan Roselione-Valdez, director of the Rubell Family Collection/Contemporary Arts Foundation, it was an honor to put these works on display and to work alongside Barilleaux. Roselione believe it was time for the works to be seen.

“The foundation of the Rubell’s collection is built on contemporary art made in America and Germany, and this exhibition is the first in-depth presentation for the latter,” said Roselione-Valdez. “For the last 40 years, Germany has been a wellspring for American artists, curators and collectors. Thanks to the McNay, we are able to focus on and share these works with a greatly expanded audience in a world class museum.”

Ultimately, the “Made in Germany” exhibit will display art that is proactive and often explored the German social consciousness through narrative imagery and elements drawn from the real world. The McNay would like their audience to get a full grip on the works by including several interactive events: a conversation between Barilleaux and the Rubells, a Sunday afternoon family activity, a contemporary German film series, and a program connecting German and Mexican cultures around Polka and Conjunto music.

Throughout the exhibits, this will give the audience a lens through an exhibit that was previously hidden and is now ready to be displayed.

“Made in Germany: Contemporary Art from the Rubell Family Collection” was unveiled on Feb. 10 and will be on display till April 24. Visit <http://www.mcnayart.org> for more information about the exhibit including hours and directions
